Practical Privacy II
Thursday, December 15, 2005
Noon, EST (Telephone Participation Only)

There is little question that privacy and information security issues are becoming increasing concerns for enterprises of all sizes and types, and no question that federal, state and international enforcement agencies are increasingly on the lookout for violations of the myriad privacy laws layered onto compliance agendas. Most businesses know why they should comply, and most have a pretty good idea of what the must do. The real issue for today's privacy world is how to do it, and how to do it effectively, efficiently and reliably.

In this installment of the now-annual Practical Privacy series, we will hear from experienced outside counsel as well as chief privacy officers of business spanning the manufacturing, financial services, high technology and information services fields as they discuss the practical realities of designing, implementing and maintaining working privacy and information security systems in the face of a thicket of laws, regulations and expectations. This will be a "from the trenches" perspective, a roundtable discussion in which our panel, and the audience, will share best practices, real experiences and their insights on managing personal information in today's world.

In addition, if you would like to join the Privacy and Security and Corporate Counseling Committees, click <http://www.abanet.org/antitrust/at-committees/at-committees.html> scroll down to "Join a Committee Quick and Easy" click the drop down menu and select "Privacy and Security" and "Corporate Counseling" and follow the instructions.
